Wide beaches invite swimmers for a cool dip. Sun bathing was first introduced here by scandalous actress Sarah Bernhardt, who took to the beach during daylight hours in scanty clothing. Rio boasts 250 days of sun per year.

To prove that glamour doesn't need silk stockings and silver spoons, simply beaches of Rio de Janeiro, where women in "dental floss" bikinis, who prob tiny apartments, exude the aura of elegance eluding anyone who has shop Mart in a sweat suit.

Forget the miraculous ingredient in their lives that appears to deflect cellul happens to all who stroll the legendary beaches of Ipanema, even in your c one-piece, or even those who slosh across the marble floors of the Copacal Hotel, dripping from the pool. Unlike any other city in the world, Rio elevat to phenomenal.

With its dramatic setting of jungle, mountain and beach, rich ethnic culture and dining, and the fun-loving cariocas (locals), this sunny city delights all and seems to alert a few you may not even be aware of. An undertone of e electrifies the air, for both tourists and locals: Brazil has one of the lowest i rates. Once a carioca, always a carioca. So beware her charms.

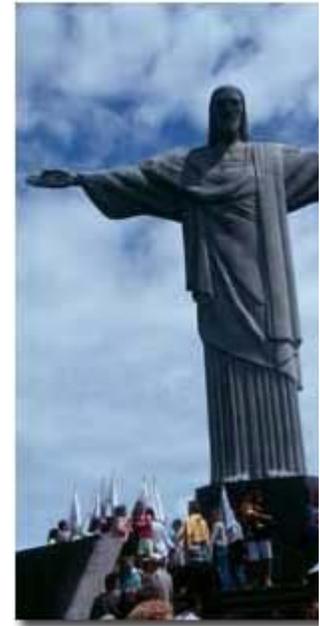

As you arrive in Rio, the picture perfect harbor opens its arms wide to welc revealing its brightest blue against bleached white sand. Look up, and anot arms stretches out, the statue of Christ the Redeemer, the monumental ar sculpture seen from virtually all of Rio. Sitting atop Corcovado (hunchback) the statue can be reached by a train ride up the 2,300-foot (700 meters) s 100-foot (30 meters) figure. Your reward is a 360-degree view of the city a

- Stick to your familiar patterns, as Rio is a big city with a huge slum. Just like U.S. cities, there are good parts and bad parts, so stick to the good. And, even so, leave the big diamonds at home and make use of your hotel safe.
- If the heat of the sand becomes oppressive, take to the nearby mountains world's largest urban forest, a UNESCO (United Nations Education, Scientific Cultural Organization) reserve. A jeep ride through the Tijuca rainforest off at the original home of the Tamoios people. Every inch is crammed with life trees, orchids and monkeys carrying young on their backs.
- Two hundred types of bromeliads bloom in the trees. A Morpho butterfly shimmers in the sky with high intensity blue. On your way down, stop in at the Burle Marx Center, former home of Brazil's most famous landscape artist.
- When night falls, enjoy a decadent meal of Brazilian barbecue, brought to you on large skewers and served until appetite death. Afterwards, there are plenty of opportunities to work it off. The rhythms of samba, bossa nova, choro, tango and Brazilian rock call the dancers to the floor, and dance they can, moving with grace.
- Don't worry if you feel like Sasquatch lumbering across the floor; take another drink of your caipirinha, made from limes and sugar cane rum. As a testimony to the loving Brazilians, their cachaça ranks as the world's third most consumed alcoholic beverage.
- The Lido area in Copacabana is packed with clubs blaring out music. Rio has plenty of outdoor bars and many of the kinks of bar service; you get a number and pay all at the end of the night. "Rio Scenarium" and "Casa da Mae Joana" are two popular nightspots.
- "The Girl from Ipanema," just a teenager when the song was written, still visits this ocean front neighborhood and often stops in the song's namesake restaurant which serves excellent drinks and a good bar food. (Her real name is Héloísa)
